THURSDAY EVENING, JAN. 29, 1880. A Hard Swim.

There are few things more delightful than to be at sea on a fine summer day, with a bright blue sky above and a bright blue sea below, while the fresh breeze fills your sails, and the great smooth waves toss you lightly along, and spatter you at times with their glitting spray, like frolicsome giants. But it is a very different thing to be out in the teeth of a real equinoctial gale, with the whole sky black as ink, and the whole sea one sheet of boiling foam, and a huge wave coming thundering over the deck every other minute, sweeping everything before it, and making the whole vessel tremblo from stem to stern.
So, doubtless, thought Olaf Petersen, captain and owner of the Norwegian schooner Thyra, of Bergen, when just such a storm caught him half way across the North Sea. It did seem rather hard, after March, that fresh, genial April should serve him such a trick; but so it was, and instead of having a short and easy run northeastward to Bergen, as he expected, he found himself flying away to the west, driven by a gale which seemed strong enough to blow him right round the world, if it did not happen to sink him by the

All the sails had long since been taken in, and the little craft was scudding under bare poles, no none being on deck but the two men at the wheel (who had quite enough to do keeping her head straight) and the captain himself. A fine picture Olaf Petersen would have made as he stood there, with the spray rattling like hail upon his drenched tarpaulins, and his clear bright eye looking keenly out through the wet hair that was plastered over his face. It might be seen by the firm set of his mouth that he meant to fight it out while a plank would swim; but he looked grave and anxious, nevertheless.

And well he might. This time it was not only his vessel and the lives of himself and his crew that were in danger; his young wife was on board, after whom the Thyra had been named, and it was now too late to blame himself for having granted her entreaty to be allowed to sail along with him, instead of being left at home by herself for so many weary weary weeks, without knowing whether he was alive or Still it blew harder, and harder yet. Had not the Thyra been as good a seaboat as ever swam, it would have been all over with her. Even as it was, she could barely hold her own against the mountains of water that came plunging over her deck with a force that seemed sufficient to rend a rock. More than once the captain's stiffened fingers were almost rigging, while the men at the wheel were under water again and again. Vainly did hope of seeing a break in the inky sky. All was grim and gloomy, and amid the blinding spray and the deepening darkness it was hard to tell where the sea ended and the sky began.

All that night and all the next morning they droved blindly onward, not knowing where they were; for the sun had not been seen for two whole days, and no observation could be taken. But Captain Petersen, who had those seas by heart, began to fear that they were being driven in among the Orkney Isles, and he knew only too well what chance the stoutest three-decker would have against those tremendous rocks with such a sea running.

Toward afternoon the wind fell suddenly, though the sea still ran high; but now Look at Our Astonishingly Low Price came something worse than all—one of those terrible Northern fogs which turn day into night, and make the oldest sailor as helplees as a child. The lanterns were lit and hoisted, the ship's bell was kept constantly tolling, and the captain ordered up two "look-outs" beside himself : but the fog grew thicker and thicker, till those on those on the forecastle could barely make out the foremast.

Ha! what was that huge dim dim shadow that loomed out suddenly just ahead,

like a threatening giant? Could it be a "Port your helm !--port!" roared the captain, at the full pitch of his voice. But it was too late. The next moment there came a deafening crash, a shock that threw them all off their feet, and the vessel, with her bows stove in, was sawing and grinding upon the sharp rocks that had pierced her through and through, with the water rushing into her like a cataract. The next few minutes were like the confusion of a troubled dream-a shadowy vision of a huge dark mass overhead, a short fierce struggle amid whirling foam and broken timbers-and then the captain and wife found themselves upon one of the higher ledges, hardly knowing how they had reached it, while the crew, with bleeding hands and sorely bruised limbs, dragged themselves painfully up after them. They were not a moment too soon. Scarcely had the last man gained the ledge when the mountain wave took the vessel aback. She slid off the rocks which had held her up, and went down so quickly that the captain, turning at the shouts of his men, just caught a glimpse of her topmast vanishing under water. The situation of the shipwrecked crew was now dreary enough. Alone upon a bare rock in the midst of a stormy sea, with no means of escape, and no food but the few brine-soaked biscuits in their pockets, there seemed to be nothing left for them but to give themselves up and dic. But, of all men living, a sailor is the least apt to think his case hopeless, however hard it may appear. Having just been saved from apparently certain death, the stout-hearted seamen were in no mood to despair so easily; and settling themselves snugly in a sheltered cleft of the rock, they ate their scauty meal (a goad share of which had been reserved for Mrs. Petersen) as cheerily as if they were lying at anchor in Bergen harbor. Just as the meal ended, the fog sudden ly rolled away like a curtain, and the last gleam of the setting sun showed them an island several miles to the north, on the shore of which the keen-eyed captain made out a few white specks that looked like fishermen's huts.

"Lads," cried he, "if the wind rises we stick here all night, with no room to move about. There's just one chance left | Germantown Telegraph. for us, and I'm going to take it. Some-body must swim to that island for help, and as I believe I'm the best swimmer, among us, I'll be the one to do it. "

night. Then came a long silence. The luscious fruit, that we are not willing to men looked at each other, no one daring to see inferior kinds recommended without a utter the thought which was in every one's mind, while Thyra Petersen hid her face in her hands, and prayed as she had never prayed before Meanwile Captain Petersen, who had told no more than the truth in calling himself a good swimmer, was breasting the waves manfully. But he soon found the difference between attempting a long swim when quite fresh and vigorous, and doing the same thing after a hard night's work on short allowance of food, and with limbs stiffened by wet and cold. Moreover, the sea, although much quieter than it had been, was still rough enough to tell sorely against him. Before he had gone a mile he felt his strength beginning to fail; but he thought of his wife, and of all the other lives that now depended upon him alone and struggled desperately onward. But inches thick, and containing eight to now came a new trouble. In the deepening twelve pounds each. Four of these are darkness the island for which he was heading soon disappeared altogether, and he with a changeable nozzle, so as to regulate found himself swimming almost at random. Every stroke was now a matter of tremendous hydraulic pressure, under which escaping all the storms of blustering life and death, and yet each of those the composition is pushed through the strokes might be taken in the wrong di- nozzle in the shape of a long cord, and rection. It was a terrible thought. Heavier and heavier grew his cramped limbs, harder and harder pressed the merciless sea. He sank-rose-sank again, and as he came up once more, lifted his voice in a despairing cry, feeling that all was over. "Hist, laddies! there's some ane skirling" (screaming), shouted a hoarse voice near him.

There was a sudden splash of oars, a clamor of many voices, and then a strong hand clutched him as he sank for the last time. So utterly was he spent that he could barely force out the few words needful to tell his story; but these were quite enough for the Orkney fishermen, who at once put about and steered straight for the rock.

It was a glad sight for the weary watchers, when the boat came gliding toward them out of the darkness. But when they recognized their captain, whom they had long since given up for lost, they gathered their last strength for a feeble cheer, while poor Thyra sprang into the boat, and threw her arms round his neck without a word. So ended Captain Petersen's daring swim, which brought him good in a way

that he little expected; for when the news of the feat reached Bergen, the townspeople at once started a subscription to Protect Your Street Trees. We have on more than one occasion called attention to the singular fact of people who would give many a dollar for a good shade tree before their doors, yet neglect the very small cost that will protect them torn from their hold upon the weather against the ravages of hor.es; for there is very little doubt that it is from the horse, and not from any inability of trees to grow, that we find trees almost entirely absent from the older portions of cities and towns. We have seen many fine trees killed in this way and we have more than one now in our mind's eye that will in a little while go in the same way unless at once protected. A good shade tree in front of a dwelling is worth at least a hundred dollars, and many people would not be deprived of them for anything like this price, for it takes half a generation to grow a new one. Yet those very people will see the bark of their trees eaten off without a thought that it is damaging the tree, and would hitch their own horse to another's tree under the same circumstances. There are only two ways in which one can preserve the luxury of shades trees before his door in the public streets, and that is first by the investment of a few dollars in tree-guards or tree protectors of some kind; and secondly by the universal spreading of the knowledge that the bark is the life of the tree. If half way round is taken away, the tree has only half the proper chance of getting food, and the next year succeeding the loss it will not grow well. The leaves keep of a sickly tint all summer, and fall early in autumn. Besides this the growth is proportionately weak. When the bark is wholly taken off in a complete circle, there is no more hope for the tree's life. All connection with the roots are severed so far as a long continuance of life is concerned. These things are of course known to all our intelligent readers; but experience shows how few others know them-and we hope, for the good of the whole of us who enjoy street trees, all our readers who know these things will turn missionaries and teach those who don't. And to show that we practice what we preach, the trees in front of our own premises, now about or nearly a foot in diameter, which have been protected by boxes from the day they were planted, are about to have new boxes placed around them, the present ones showing signs of decay. - Germantown

Telegraph.

An Incorrect Statement. Germantown Telegraph. Mr. Lauer, the famous brewer of Read ing. Pa., claims also to be a farmer, and makes speeches-for he is a good oratorat the agricultural meetings of the grand old county of Berks. At a late meeting he is reported as saying that "in England all the farming land is owned by 150 noblemen. There the poor remain poor and the rich remain rich, while in America any man who chooses can become the owner of real estate." We think that Mr. L. is too well informed a man to have made UPHOLSTERING IN ALL ITS BRANCHES. such a statement. The truth is, a great deal of this kind of nonsense gets into the newspapers, and some people believe it. The nobility of England have enough to be forgiven as monopolizers of the land; but there are a great many people (farmers) in England, who are no more noblemen than we are who own and cultivate their own land. Neither is it true that the poor in England always remain poor; and everybody knows that it is equally untrue that "in America every man who chooses can become the owner of real-estate." There is not every one who chooses can afford to go West and take up government land as a free gift. It takes money to do that, put up the buildings, stock the farm, and support a family for at least a year. Of course the chances here are as a hundred to one compared to those in England, and these chances will go on increasing until the laws of primogeniture are abolished there.

The Clairgeau Pear.

We notice that this beautiful pear is recommended as worthy of cultivation. We know not what the experience of the writer may be with it, but so far as our own goes, "Olaf!" cried his wife, catching him by the arm, "you won't think of it! It's certain death!" may be with it, but so far as our own goes, having grown it for over twenty years on quince, we would not like, as an honest man, to advise anyone to waste his time man, to advise anyone to waste his time and ground with it. There is no question-"I haven't swum across Bergen Bay ing one thing about the Clairgeau, that it and back for nothing. It's certain death is one of the largest and handsomest pears to sit here and freeze, if you like; but grown; but when this is said, all is said in you'll soon see me coming back with lits favor. Up to last year, with a yearly half a dozen stout fellows, and we'll all crop upon two small trees—generally havhave a good supper before the night's out. | ing to remove more than half of them-we

In making slate pencils broken slate is put into a mortar run by steam, and pounded into small particles. Then it goes into a mill and runs into a "bolting' machine, such as is used in flouring mills, where it is "bolted," the fine, almost impalpable, flour that results being taken to a mixing tub, where a small quantity of steatite flour, similarly manufactured, is added, together with other material, the whole being made into a stiff dough. This dough is kneaded thoroughly by passing it several times between iron rollers. Thence it is conveyed to a table where it is made into "charges," or short evlinders, four or five placed in a strong iron chamber or "retort," the size of the pencils, and subjected to passed over a sloping table slit at right angles with the cords to give passage to a knife which cuts them into lengths. They are then laid on boards to dry, and, after a few hours, are removed to sheets of corrugated zinc, the corrugation serving to prevent the pencils from warping during the process of baking, to which they are next subjected in a kiln, into which superheated steam is introduced in pipes, the temperature being regulated according to the requirements of the article exposed to its influence. From the kiln the articles go to the finishing and packing room, where the ends are thrust for a second under rapidly revolving emery wheels and withdrawn neatly and smoothly pointed. They are then packed in pasteboard boxes, each containing one hundred pencils, and these boxes are in turn packed for shipment in wooden boxes, containing one hundred each, or ten thousand pencils in a shipping box. Nearly all the work is done by boys, and the cost, therefore, is light.
